

Development of Indian Nationalism under British Rule

Umashankar Ram

The Indian Nationalism during British period was solely efforts to meet the challenge of foreign domination. There growth of a national sentiment among the people was consequence of a foreign rule. The British had conquered India to promote their own interest and they ruled over whole period with that object in India.

The realization in India for British government brought bitterness against foreign rule and that was responsible for the growth of the nationalist movement to drive out the foreigners from the country. All classes of people in India participated one stage or the other in the nationalist movement and all played their part in the freedom struggle. The British came to India as traders and founded an empire in 1757 which ended in 1947.
